INSTALL GUIDE

H.I.V.A View™ Siliconoptics

We recommend using the Hadron Industries™ Certified Eye Speculum and Eyelid Retractor Set™ to ensure proper needle placement. After cleaning the area, wear gloves or washed hands to ensure sterility. Using the dropper labeled A3, administer bupivacaine into the eye. Next, remove the vial labeled A6. Next, withdraw one milliliter. Administer the formula directly into the pupil.

This formula allows for the creation of pathways through the eye and into the rest of the brain that allows the H.I.V.A.view hardware to integrate with your central nervous system.

Next, withdraw one more milliliter of the solution and input into the paired neural port replica in package B2. Prime the interpolation in package C1. When ready, position interpolation over eye socket. Before proceeding with installation, read all included documentation pertaining to possible side effects.

Hadron Industries does not retain liability over improperly installed or counterfeit biohardware.

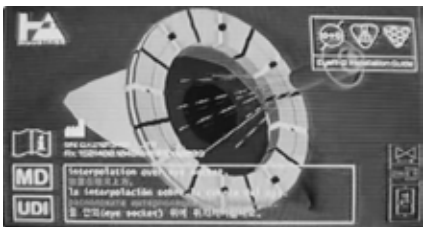

When ready, use the button the interpelator to complete the installation.

Hadron Subsidiary Unveils Converter Kit to Restart Cars Disabled in Malware Attack

Gas prices climb to $1.20 a gallon, a crisis-era high, on news of the breakthrough

Researchers at a Hadron Industries subsidiary have developed a converter kit that bypasses the computerized systems in most vehicles to start the engine, marking the first major breakthrough since the terrorist malware attack that disabled more than 90 percent of cars last year.

The kit will not be available to the public for another year. Even so, word of its development has pushed gas prices to $1.20 a gallon, the highest level since the crisis began.

Critics warn the device could pose safety risks by overriding built-in vehicle systems. Some have also raised concerns that it could make it easier for thieves to start cars without keys or authorization.

The malware attack triggered the collapse of the federal government, which was subsequently bought out by Hadron Industries. The economic fallout has been severe, but it has also spurred growth in some sectors.

Refurbishing pre-digital vehicles, which lack the computerized systems targeted in the attack, has grown into a major industry. Hadron has also pioneered on-foot delivery systems following its merger with the USPS and several large delivery companies.

With most cars still immobile, experts advise owners against selling affected vehicles for scrap. Solutions like the converter kit could become available soon, they say, potentially restoring vehicles that would otherwise be lost.
